Elijah Burton

COMMERCIAL PILOT,
STORYTELLER, SURFER

When Elijah Burton was a young boy growing up in New Jersey, he had an indelible ocean experience that made him feel tiny and helpless, enmeshed with the larger forces of nature in a way that left him terrified. He was a strong swimmer, but found himself caught in a rip current, watching the shore and his family recede far out of reach. He realized he'd never been so far from the beach.

"The ocean is the thing that I'm the most afraid of," said Burton. "But it holds the thing that I love so much. If you work with the ocean, it gives you what you desire."

"We've started to build a community around people who look like us and come from places we come from, people who do the same things or can learn to love the outdoors."

As hard as he swam that day, he drifted out farther. Neither of his parents were swimmers — knee-high was as far as they'd venture. His older brother though knew the mechanics of a rip and swam out to rescue him.

Fast forward and Elijah is based in Portland where he's a commercial pilot and spends every spare moment he can in the water or on trails.

"I bought my first goats and it's like potato chips. You can't just have one. I wanted all the goats. So, I asked myself, 'what job can I have where I get to have all the goats?'"

Rachael Taylor-Tuller

VETERAN, GOAT FARMER, MOTHER

There's a reliable cadence to Rachael Taylor-Tuller's life — twice a day she milks the goats, three times a week she turns that milk into cheese, and once a week that cheese ends up in shops along the Interstate 5 corridor from Olympia, Washington north to Marysville. With grit and humor, she and her husband have willed 11 acres into a micro dairy that produces some of the most sought-after cheese in the Pacific Northwest.

It's a far cry from the life Rachael knew growing up an Air Force brat, never in one place long enough to put down real roots. Her dad, a Colonel and F-15 pilot, was her hero back then and when it came to choosing college, she entered the Air Force Academy, followed by a tour of service in Iraq.

"When you come back from a place like that, you're kind of dead inside," said Rachael. "You want to feel things and there's nothing more real than weathering the storms of farming."

"With a good knife, you simply don't think about it. You can concentrate on actually preparing your meal. That's what a good tool does for you — it allows you to completely forget that it exists."

Arnon Kartmazov

BLACKSMITH

The moment Arnon Kartmazov knew he had found his life's passion he was crawling in the dirt to the nearest water faucet having just climbed out of the furnace-hot forging pit of a Japanese master blacksmith. He had hammered a hunk of raw steel into shape for what seemed like an eternity. He sat under a tree with his mentor, sipping tea, mopping his face, and marveling at the sun dipping into the ocean. He was bone tired and filthy, crusted with dried sweat when he decided right then and there that he'd be doing this for the rest of his life.

Arnon was born in Siberia in the former USSR and moved to Israel where, after fulfilling his military service, he found his way to East Asian Studies in university. When he found the time, he hung around the shop of the last surviving blacksmith in Jerusalem, drawn in by the explosion of sparks from the forge and the clang of hot steel.

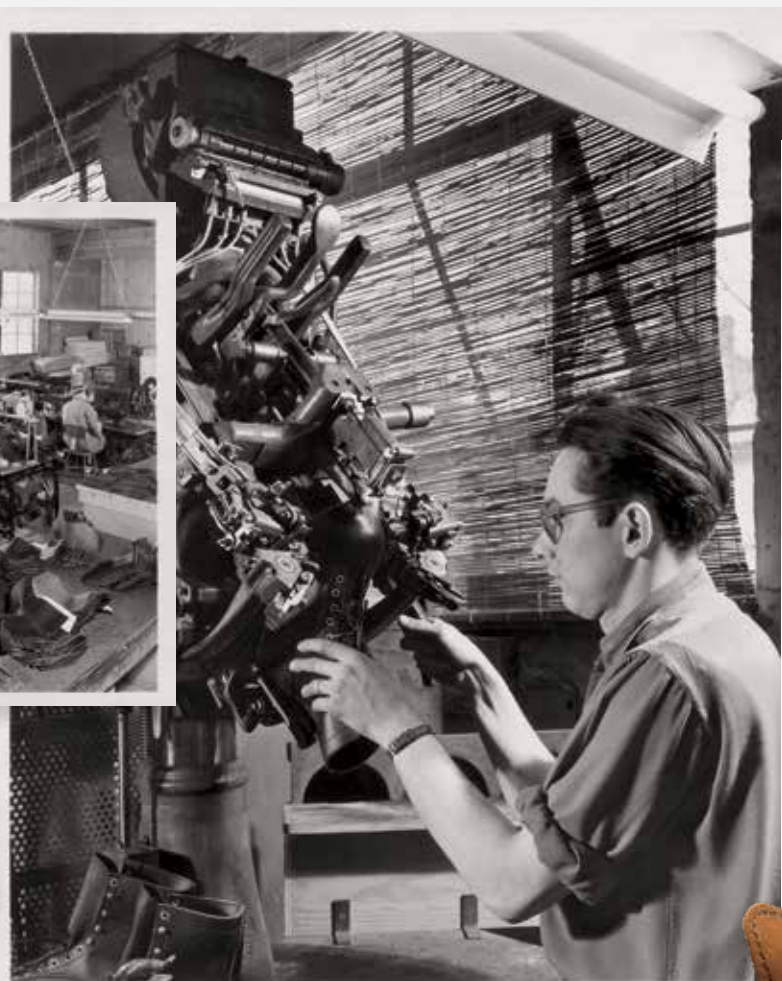

He'd always had a primal attraction to fire, light, and heat. As a boy he'd sneak off in his grandparents' apartment to build tiny fires in ashtrays, feeding the flames match by match, feeling the thrill of controlling such a powerful element.

FROM THE DESK OF BILL DANNER

We are holding out against the monotony of mass production. We still know how to cut boots by hand and we do, we pull up the shanks by hand, and we can and do use a great many other hand operations to make you finer boots. I call these things to your attention because I want you to know that it is our intention to build the best boots. We'll continue making fine boots until they pass a law requiring built-in obsolescence. Until then, we are going to give you boots that you can be proud to wear, boots that can claim the best quality available anywhere.
